Last summer, I visited a village in India. The name of the village was Shani Shingnapur. It was like any other villages, with one big difference: there were no doors there. Villagers felt safe, so they did not put doors on houses or shops. The bank had a door, but there were no locks. There was little crime in the village.

Last summer, I visited Giethoorn, the Netherlands.
There were under 3,000 people in this small village. When I came to this village, I saw it had only canals and bridges. There were no cars there. People walked or used boats instead.

It's in the Netherlands.
